Informal institutions. Theories, methods, empirical results for the post-socialist region

Simulation game “Forest economy in Fontania. Transparency and sustainable development” organized by Planpolitik (Björn Warkalla, Annegret Schneider), Berlin

(Simulating conflicts and negotiations provides a playful way of learning and understanding the political dynamics behind them. This is the exact goal of simulation games. After a negotiation or conflict situation has been chosen, the participants of the game proceed to assume the roles of the different parties and agents relevant to that situation. They have to represent their “character’s” interests convincingly and aim to make them prevail in negotiations. In order to achieve this, they must determine any existing scope for negotiation, use it to their advantage and recognise situations which call for compromise. www.planpolitik.de)
